

Yesterday's Campus Blitz: Students Share Orientation Experience

The varsity buzzed yesterday as our reporters hit the ground to interview first years about their first-day orientation experience. The stories that rolled in turned the orientation into a headline-making showcase of how newbies can turn a daunting campus initiation into a winning game plan.

First Year Share their Orientation Experiences

First year student Ayanda Sinothule Mvumi, enrolled in the Management Science Faculty's Public Management program, shared her memorable orientation ride. She said the orientation was epic, loading her with valuable information for first year students, the kind of intel that's essential to navigating her academic goals. The session grooved with campus scenes that kept students glued on their modules and on time. Ayanda also grabbed insight into the rules and regs of the institution, noting every varsity has its own playbook.

She highlighted that the orientation introduced her to support resources like the library, which helps her study effectively even in crowded halls, and to find useful sources to ace her courses.

The orientation also prepped her with the registration system, guiding her through the tech maze that made the whole experience smoother with help from officials and staff.

Alwande Gumede, a Business Law first year in the Department of Management Science, also shared her orientation insights. She described the registration journey as spicy, challenging due to a new registration process introduced by the institution. Despite the system still buggy ,she managed to complete registration and officially became a DUT student.

Alwande found the orientation good and enjoyable, with entertainment and motivational content that pushed students toward their careers. She also loved meeting new people and reconnecting with peers.

Both Ayanda and Alwande concluded that orientation helped them to connect with other students, engage with them and also learn many things about DUT culture.
